is there a way to understand and more important to make use of the experiences and emotions that we usually think of as being entirely negative how are we to make sense of life's apparent non sense the loneliness depression anxiety frustration anger apathy and anguish that we are certain to encounter in the course of living william f kraft a practicing psychotherapist maintains that we can use all of these experiences in the service of life and fulfillment once we understand that they are part of the process of growth it is only when people admit to pain and loneliness he says that they can begin to lead meaningful lives the feelings of nothingness are essential for authentic living inescapable and even necessary dr kraft discusses the experience of nothingness as a fundamental life force and as creative suffering then he analyzes the language of nothingness all the sad words for the bad emotions we meet he explores the dynamics and meaning of healthy and unhealthy as applied to our feelings proposing that man discovers himself in his sense of nothingness at various stages of his life dr kraft explores the first emergence into a consciousness of nothingness in adolescence as a sense of boredom and cynicism next he deals with the depression loneliness and frustration of early adulthood in full adulthood maintains the author the sense of nothingness is banished by commitment and a search for authentic living then in middle and old age he suggests a positive approach must be forged for experiences of depression guilt anguish and death in his final chapters dr kraft offers a new psychological approach to death and dying which are the clearest articulations we know of nothingness for everyone who thinks that alienation is a symptom of illness an experience to avoid or a sign of personal failure this book is happy and mandatory reading adapted from dust jacket
